There are normally 26 paydays per year when you get paid biweekly but if you get paid every 14 days it is possible to have 27 ($26 \times 14 = 364$ and a year has 365 or 366 days), so if you got paid on January 1 (or January 2 of a leap year) and your employer does not shift paydays around because of holidays or anything it would be 27. In some years employers have to deal with an extra pay period if they pay on a bi-weekly basis. How does this happen? If you pay every other Thursday, you will have 27 periods in some years. Or, if you pay on Fridays and you pay the day before a holiday, you will also end up with 27 pay periods if Christmas falls on a Friday. A weekly pay period results in 52 paychecks in a year. Hourly employees are often paid weekly. Sometimes these employees are paid a week in arrears. That is, they record and turn in their time sheets at the end of one week and are paid for that time a week later. And it is an issue we suspect many employers had not noticed or considered. With 52 weeks in a year, there normally are 26 bi-weekly pay periods in a calendar year. In 2015, however, there will be 27 for many employers. This oddity occurs every 11 years.
